Sawdust Trails in the Truckee Basin: A History of Lumbering Operations, 1856-1936 Dick Wilson

The Comstock silver strike meant that immense quantities of lumber were needed too build the mines. Loggers invaded the nearby Trukee Basin, set up scores of sawmills, and spent the next 75 years harvesting the virgin forest. Today little is left of this industry except rusting mill machinery, fragments of flumes and chutes, and weathered stumps. This fascinating book documents this massive operation and the many industries it supported -- mines, railroads, farms, houses and urban development. 90 pages with index.
