Excerpt from Sermons on the Stations of the Cross, the Our Father, the Hail Mary, Etc: Dedicated to the Memory of the Early Catholic Missionaries of the United States

These sermons were written, as the others were, after delivery. Some may differ with the Author as regards this method but even those who differ, may agree with him, that it is prudent for anyone to do his work in the way best adapted to himself, though this way may not be profitable or suitable to another. He may also remark, as he did in the first volume, that he wrote these sermons for pastime and self-improvement but it should not be inferred from this that he had no other purpose in view. He had time which, if not employed, would have dragged heavily upon him. Moreover, he is not so unmindful Of the distinguished merits Of others, to imagine he is beyond the sphere of self-improvement. Indeed, if there is anything Of worth in these sermons, he owes it largely to others - not that he has borrowed much, nor has he plagiarized but the erudite example set by some American priests has stimulus enough to induce other Americans to learn and to improve.

With these few Observations, the Author sends forth this volume on its unknown journey. He hopes it will make friends, meet with some success, and do much good. If it lighten the burden-of some poor mortal, or convert the gloomy forebodings Of despair into faith, hope, and charity, he shall rejoice that he has done something to alleviate the Miseries of Man.
